About this event

Description:

September is a time of new beginnings in the academic year as students across all education levels start or return to school. Teachers and instructors will open classroom doors to welcome an increased number of newcomers. This is due to the steady flow of refugees fleeing armed conflict and more arrivals because of pandemic restrictions being eased. Trauma from the migration journey can surface in the classroom for both newcomer adult learners and children. Teachers may feel they lack the wherewithal to appropriately respond to trauma and psychological distress in pupils.

From supporting student and educator mental health to adapting teaching practices to navigate the ever-changing needs of communities affected by the pandemic, educators must learn new skills to take care of themselves and ensure student success in a post-coronavirus world. How do you create a trauma-informed classroom? how do you use trauma-informed pedagogy if you are a LINC instructor or a elementary or high school educator or support staff? Join this webinar to:

- Enhance your knowledge on best practices for supporting survivors who experienced trauma due to war, torture, crimes against humanity
- Learn the do's and don'ts when working with survivors
- Hear tips on Language Instructors commitment to Truth and Reconciliation when working with Newcomers
- Learn about self-care for teachers
- Share and network with peers
